HE reforms: the impact on admission to university and the student academic experience

Wednesday 15 May 2013
The Royal Society, London

This conference examines the impact of the changes in higher education policy on university admissions. Universities are now unconstrained in their admission of students with the highest grades at A level; but at the same time they are under tighter constraints than ever in their recruitment of students with lower grades. And there are signs that demand for higher education may be reducing. On top of all this universities are being encouraged to take into account 'contextual information' in deciding which students to admit.

Meanwhile a recent Which? survey revealed many prospective students have no access to independent advice and guidance when making their applications. And once at university, how will students benefit from the increased investment in HE that the higher tuition fees provide? Are universities improving the overall student learning experience as fees are increasing?

The HEPI Spring Conference, organised in partnership with the Higher Education Academy, will bring together senior HE leaders and policy-makers who have been central to shaping and responding to the strategic direction of the policy environment for HE and provides an opportunity for their colleagues in schools, colleges and universities to discuss the new landscape. The conference will also hear results of the HEPI/Which? survey of the academic experience of students.
